

NEWS | POSTED OCTOBER 30, 2020

Infographic: What Do Kids Understand About the Political Process

Researchers sought to learn more about the political development of the nation's children. They interviewed nearly 200 elementary-school-aged children before and after the 2016 U.S. Presidential election. The infographic below summarizes some of the findings from the 2019 issue of the Monographs of the Society for Research in Child Development titled, "Toward a Developmental Science of Politics."

[Download the image \[JPEG\]](#) [Download the image \[PNG\]](#)

Visit monographmatters.srcd.org for additional resources related to this study and other issues of the Monographs of the Society for Research in Child Development.

What do kids understand about the political process?

A new study takes a closer look.

Researchers sought to learn more about the political development of the nation's children. They interviewed nearly 200 elementary-school-aged children before and after the 2016 U.S. Presidential election.

Children were interested in the election:

Adults may not be fully engaging children's interest:

Over 90% of children sampled provided information about at least one policy proposal for one of the candidates.

83% of children sampled provided information about at least one personal characteristic (such as being smart, nice, mean or rude) for one of the candidates.

Nearly all children sampled (99%) expressed a preference for one candidate to win the election and knew the election outcome.

Only 65% of children sampled knew that no woman has ever been president of the United States, a smaller percentage than has been found in past studies.

Only a single child was able to name a historical individual who worked for women's civil rights or suffrage.

To learn more please visit monographmatters.srcd.org.

Citation: Patterson, M. M., Bigler, R. S., Pahlke, E., Brown, C. S., Hayes, A. R., Ramirez, M. C., & Nelson, A. (2019). Toward a developmental science of politics. Monographs of the Society for Research in Child Development, 84(3). doi:10.1111/mono.12410